

This is a living, evolving intellectual project that addresses the human condition and the interpretation of history.

It does not claim to possess final truth, nor does it defend ideas out of stubbornness, but is committed to intellectual integrity, ethical responsibility, and to the right of ideas to be reviewed and renewed whenever understanding requires it.

The project does not arise from a ready-made ideology,

but from a human question:

How can we understand history without losing our humanity?

And how can we understand humanity without distorting history?

This work is published in multiple languages in the belief that human thought has no homeland, and that dialogue is broader than any single culture.
